I got my copy of Dungeons and Dragons at Gary Gygax's house and we took it home right before we had bought the funny dice (since we called them the funny dice) and brought those things home and it took a couple of months before the group wanted to try this new game we had bought -- Dungeons and Dragons -- and they asked me to look into how it was played and so, the next thing I did was to start reading how it worked. Well in the pamphlet about underworlds and dungeons, [Volume 3: The Underworld and Wilderness Adventures] in order to have a play this game you have to have a dungeon.

And so, there is a page on which Dave and Gary had put in eight different types of hallways and so I figured well, I've got this new funny, eight sided dice of use it, so I numbered each one of them one through eight and started rolling up a dungeon! And when it turned a direction I would roll the ten-sider because it was the dodecahedron which means 20-sider, but I'm not, but we only use 10 at that time and that would tell me how far I went before I had to roll for another direction and another type of hallway and then I would roll to see if where they were doors and rooms, or if they were secret doors, and where every time it turned down those. There was the random table again in the pamphlet and undergrounds telling me what kinds of critters might be in the rooms and I wouldn't tell him until we started playing the dungeon, and then I would roll randomly to see what was in the room, and then how much they had and how many critters.

After we got done playing in the dungeon for a period of time we decide that we wanted to try the outdoor encounters and I found an old map that Dave Arneson had given me of the year Civil War campaign that he was running and so I used that. I changed the names and not telling them where they were reusing the map as I would tell him what was on the map and rolling encounters again using the tables right out of the original books. After this had gone for a while, I decided to make my own world, so I could go on before I had even talked to Dave.

And Dave said "Start your own world" and so by this time I had got a copy of a game called "Search for the Source of a Nile". In the game there was a mapping tool. I used hex graph paper and rolling dice to map the coast of the continent of my world. I work for about a week to a month before I finished, when the lines met. I ended up with a map that filled a whole ping-pong table.

It also told me where the mouths of rivers came out to the coastline, using the mountains, and making a map of the winds. I found where deserts and climates were.

We were really into Jack Vance's "Dying Earth" and so I put the different spells in different places all over the map, and as the players traveled around they discovered the different spells and were able to add them to their spell books.

Note: the following pages show details from the atlas.

If you look at the original map, you will see that it is divided into sections, numbered 2 – 100.

Each section has its own page (in some cases multiple pages) which indicates details about the geography, cities, and people in the area.

Spells and special items are also indicated.
